Cardboard Cut-out

"Was the Inner Diamond just a figment of my imagination, Gina? Did I make it all up? Have I become so numb, so unconscious, that I can barely feel what's going on within me? It's as if my capacity to feel things is blunted. I shouldn't be feeling like this. Especially when things are finally going well for me." An acute pain intensified in my abdomen.

"It's still there. Remember when you decided not to get married, you had a compelling intuition that you had to wait and work on discovering your true inner Self." Gina reminded me.

"Huh huh," I nodded, still in the depths of despair.

"Well, all that's happened and what it's left you to deal with, are guideposts to the areas within you that you'll have to work on healing. Then you can know who you are beneath the clutter of emotions and suffering. You'll discover the real you, beyond the illusion of who it seems you are," Gina said.

"Well, meanwhile, I feel like a cardboard cut-out of myself. Two-dimensional with no depth," I said, looking in at myself from the outside, like a fly on the wall.
